The home console market in the US was still reeling from the video game crash of 1983, a turbulent time in gaming history. The giant Atari had fallen, and the market, saturated with an overabundance of hardware choice and poor quality titles, crashed hard. Despite this, Nintendo wanted to conquer the US market, but they feared the Famicom looked too much like a toy. They went back to the drawing board and in 1985 pinned all their hopes on a VCR style re-design and name rebrand; the Nintendo Entertainment System
